Two men accused of sexually assaulting a woman in 2019 were acquitted following a eight-day trial.

Adrian Garcia-Ramirez, 23, and Eduardo Quezada, 30, were both found not guilty on all charges, including two counts of sexual assault, late Wednesday according to the Boulder County District Attorney's Office.

Hillary Aizenman, Garcia-Ramirez's attorney, and Quezada's attorneys Lauren Butler and Ashley Telleen issued a joint statement.

"We are thankful that the brave jurors of Boulder County looked at the case objectively and free from emotion and prejudice," the statement read. "Our clients have waited for their day in court for over two years and are grateful to have finally been vindicated in their quest for justice."

Prosecutors also issued a statement Thursday.

"I want to recognize the courage of the victim in coming forward and going through this process," Boulder County District Attorney Michael Dougherty said in a statement. "As with every trial, we appreciate the service of the jurors and respect their verdict."

According to an arrest affidavit, a woman accused Garcia-Ramirez, Quezada and a third man, Jesus Guerrero-Argumedo, of sexually assaulting her on Aug. 11, 2019.

The three were all set for a joint trial, but Guerrero-Argumedo fell out of compliance with pre-trial GPS monitoring and failed to appear for trial. A warrant remains open for his arrest, and the charges against him were not included in the verdict.

Garcia-Ramirez does have another pending sex assault case in Boulder County, and is scheduled for an arraignment in that case on March 4.
